

PROPHET NUH

BY CHILDBOOK.AI

Long ago, a kind man named Nuh lived in a small town. The people there worshipped statues instead of Allah. Allah chose Nuh to teach them the truth. 'There is only one God, and He loves you,' Nuh said gently. He smiled at children and helped his neighbors carry water every day. He believed patience would soften hearts slowly, like morning dew settling on leaves. Nuh trusted Allah completely, ready to teach with kindness for as long as it took.

Nuh spoke to his people every day. 'Please stop worshipping stone idols,' he said kindly. Some people laughed. Others turned away and covered their ears. 'Old stories are enough for us,' they said. Nuh did not get angry. He simply smiled and tried again the next day. He remembered Allah's promise: patience always brings mercy, even when answers seem far away.

Days turned into years, yet Nuh never stopped teaching. He walked through markets, calling gently, 'Believe in Allah, the One who created us all.' Many still refused to listen. Some threw stones, but Nuh remained calm. 'Allah is patient with us,' he told himself, 'so I will be patient too.' His heart stayed strong, filled with hope. He trusted Allah's plan more than his own worries.

One night, Allah spoke to Nuh. 'Build a great ark, a strong boat, for a flood is coming.' Nuh did not question the command. He gathered wood and began to build, plank by plank. His hands grew tired, but his faith grew stronger. 'This is Allah's plan,' he whispered, hammering nails under the warm sun. He worked with hope, knowing mercy was near.

People gathered to watch Nuh build his enormous boat far from any river. 'Why build a ship on dry land?' they laughed. Children pointed and giggled. Nuh kept hammering, unbothered by their words. 'Allah's promise will come true,' he said calmly. He trusted that soon, the laughter would turn to wonder. Patience filled every board he placed.

When the ark stood finished, Allah sent a wonderful sign. Animals came in pairs—lions, birds, elephants, and rabbits—walking calmly toward the ark. Nuh guided them gently inside, two by two. His family joined him, carrying food and water. 'Allah's mercy provides for all creatures,' Nuh said, smiling as the last dove flew aboard. The air grew heavy, as if the sky itself was waiting.

Dark clouds filled the sky, and thunder rumbled loudly. Rain poured down harder than anyone had ever seen. Water rose from the ground too, filling streets and fields. People ran, frightened, finally realizing Nuh's warnings were true. Inside the ark, animals huddled together, safe and calm. Nuh whispered a prayer of thanks, watching the flood rise higher outside the wooden walls.

Nuh saw his son, Kan'an, standing far away on a hill. 'Come aboard, my son!' Nuh called with worry. 'I will climb the mountain to safety,' Kan'an shouted back. Nuh's heart ached with sadness. 'Only Allah's mercy can save us now,' he whispered. The waves grew taller, swallowing the hill completely. Nuh prayed quietly, trusting Allah through his tears.

The ark floated steadily upon the rising water, rocking gently with each wave. Inside, animals rested peacefully, and Nuh's family stayed close together. Thunder crashed outside, but the wooden walls held strong. 'Allah protects us,' Nuh said softly, comforting everyone. Days passed slowly, filled with prayers and patience. The storm raged on, yet hope never left the ark.

After many days, the rain finally stopped. Nuh opened a small window and released a gentle dove. 'Find us dry land,' he said softly. The dove flew far across the endless water, searching everywhere. Hours passed with quiet waiting. Nuh watched the sky, hopeful and patient, trusting Allah's mercy would soon appear.

The dove returned, carrying a fresh green leaf in its beak. Nuh's eyes filled with joyful tears. 'Land is near!' he announced happily. Slowly, the water began to sink lower each day. The ark gently settled upon a tall mountain called Judi. Everyone cheered quietly, thankful for Allah's mercy after such a long journey.

Nuh and his family stepped onto fresh green ground, filled with gratitude. Animals scattered happily across the earth, starting new lives. Nuh raised his hands and prayed, 'Thank you, Allah, for Your endless mercy.' The sun shone warmly, promising a hopeful future. From that day, Nuh taught everyone about patience, faith, and Allah's loving care, remembering how mercy always follows those who trust and wait.
