

FROGGY WITH A BIG DREAM

BY CHILDBOOK.AI

Freddie Frog perched on a smooth stone while other frogs splashed and croaked in the Great Swamp pond. He traced blueprints in the mud with his webbed toe, dreaming of towers and bridges. 'Why sketch dirt pictures when you could be swimming?' teased a passing newt. Freddie only smiled. He had noticed the water rising near Mossy Hollow, and he wondered if engineering could save his neighbors before the next storm arrived.

That afternoon, Freddie met Bramble, a clever beetle tinkering with twigs near the reeds. 'You're building wrong,' Freddie said gently, pointing at the wobbly stack. 'Civil engineers use triangles for strength.' Bramble's eyes lit up. Together they sketched a levee design, weaving reeds and packing mud into sturdy walls. 'If this holds,' Bramble said, 'Mossy Hollow stays dry.' Freddie nodded, determined, already imagining how pulleys might lift the heavier logs they would need tomorrow.

Thunder rumbled, and rain battered the swamp. The levee groaned, then a log shifted loose, threatening to break the wall. 'We need more force!' Bramble shouted over the wind. Freddie remembered pulley systems and quickly rigged vines around a sturdy branch, creating leverage to hoist the log back into place. 'Pull now!' he cried. Together they heaved, muscles straining, until the log locked tight. The levee held, water rushing safely past Mossy Hollow instead of through it.

By morning, the storm had passed, and Mossy Hollow stood dry and safe. Bramble inspected the sturdy levee, amazed by its clever design. 'You really are an engineer,' Bramble said proudly. Freddie blushed, webbed hands fidgeting with his pencil. He realized that even small sketches in the mud could grow into ideas that protected an entire swamp. From that day on, Freddie Frog kept dreaming, kept building, and kept helping the Great Swamp thrive.
