Once upon a time, there was a kind-hearted man named Marcus. He was a famous football player for Manchester United. Marcus had a big heart and wanted to help people who needed it. One day, he came up with a wonderful idea to help homeless people during Christmas. He called it the 'In the Box' campaign. Marcus teamed up with Selfridges to give essential items to homeless people. He even visited homeless shelters and sent boxes to children in his grandmother's home country, Saint Kitts and Nevis.

Marcus didn't stop there. He knew that many children were going hungry and he wanted to make a difference. So, he set up something called the Child Food Poverty Task Force. Marcus worked with UK food shops, manufacturers, charities, and delivery companies to tackle child food poverty. Together, they made sure that no child would go to bed hungry.

One day, Marcus decided to start a petition to end child food poverty. He believed that if enough people spoke up, the government would have to listen. So, he asked people to sign his petition. And guess what? Over 1 million people signed it! Marcus was amazed by the support he received.

Marcus's hard work paid off. Because of his campaign, the government decided to take action. They provided almost £400 million to support poor families with food and household bills. Marcus was overjoyed to see that his efforts were making a real difference in the lives of so many people.

But Marcus didn't stop there. He knew that there was still more to be done. He questioned the government about a permanent increase in Universal Credit, which helps families in need. Marcus believed that every family should have enough money to live a happy and healthy life. He wanted to make sure that no child would have to worry about going hungry.

Marcus loved reading and he wanted to share his passion with children all around the world. So, he started a book club and even wrote a children's book called 'You Are A Champion.' Children everywhere were excited to join Marcus's book club and read his inspiring stories. Reading became even more fun for many children, thanks to Marcus.

Marcus's kindness and determination inspired many people. People started to realize that they too could make a difference, no matter how big or small. They started helping others in their communities, just like Marcus did. The world became a better place because of Marcus's actions.

And so, Marcus became known as a true champion for kids. His kind heart and selfless actions showed everyone the power of compassion and the importance of helping those in need. Marcus's legacy lived on, inspiring generations to come. And remember, dear children, each one of you has the power to be a champion too, just like Marcus Rashford.
