

A DWARF WHO LOST HIS STARS

by childbook.ai

One clear night, Till, a dwarf in a red hat, decided he was too tired to attend to his duties. He was responsible for polishing the stars in the sky, making them twinkle brightly for everyone to see. Instead, he chose to nap, thinking the sky could go one night without his care. Little did he know, his decision would have unforeseen consequences.

As Till slept soundly, the stars began to lose their luster. By midnight, the sky was unusually dim, and the stars barely twinkled. People around the world noticed the change, feeling a mix of confusion and sadness. The sky, once a sparkling blanket of beauty, now looked neglected and dull.

Wind, an old man with a long beard in blue pants, noticed the fading stars. He immediately knew Till had not fulfilled his duties. Wind hurried to Till's home and woke him with a stern warning. "The stars are fading because of your negligence. You must fix what you have caused," Wind advised, hoping Till would heed his words.

Till, realizing the gravity of his mistake, rushed to restore the stars' twinkle. He worked harder than he ever had, polishing each star with care and dedication. By dawn, the stars shone brightly once again, and Till learned the importance of responsibility. From that night on, he never skipped his duties again.
